Supreme Court's Chevron Opinion A Game Changer For States Fighting Federal Overreach

By Governor Doug Burgum Last week, the U.S. Supreme Court delivered a crushing blow to the Biden regulatory regime and its army of unelected federal bureaucrats who have repeatedly overstepped their authority to the detriment of states, industries and consumers.

By overturning the 40-year-old Chevron deference doctrine, justices sent a clear message that Congress, not federal agencies, is responsible for making laws. And the high court confirmed that it's the role of the courts, not agency "experts," to interpret those laws.

For too long, federal agencies have abused the Chevron doctrine to ignore the will of Congress and impose costly, unworkable rules and regulations on our most important industries including agriculture, energy production and manufacturing.

The end of Chevron deference is the beginning of the end of impractical and ridiculous one-size-fits-all federal "rules" manufactured by partisan ideologues and then enforced as "laws," often with no recourse for companies or states but to take the federal government to court.

North Dakota knows about Biden's regulatory overreach all too well. We are currently engaged in battling the federal government on over 30 rules and regulations covering everything from unattainable emission caps designed to kill electricity generation plants to a draft plan that would cut off nearly half of federal oil and gas acreage from leasing.

The Supreme Court's long overdue opinion is a game changer for innovation in every industry. Instead of spending countless hours and dollars fighting misguided, backward-looking regulations cooked up by unelected bureaucrats in the D.C. swamp, America's job creators will be able to focus on solving the challenges of today and tomorrow with forward-looking, inflation-busting innovation.

It's also a major victory for states' rights. Serving as North Dakota's governor these past seven-plus years has affirmed my view of the 50 states as 50 platforms of innovation. Allowing states to employ different approaches to solving shared challenges should be considered a strength, not a weakness. If there's one thing the heavy hand of the federal bureaucracy has proven, it's that one-size-fits-all red tape doesn't work to solve complex issues in a nation of our size with our geology, geography and weather.

The competition of ideas is why the world's largest and strongest economy exists in these free United States and not in monolithically controlled countries. It's why China steals and copies technology from U.S. entrepreneurs. It's why U.S. influence spread across the globe as the Soviet Union imploded.

Energy production is a prime example of how a centralized bureaucracy can't even coordinate within themselves, much less react to the innovation required to keep up with the speed of changes in the market. The Biden administration's energy policy is a total mess, attempting to phase out U.S. baseload power plants while attacking internal combustion machines with ridiculously expensive subsidies for charging stations and electric vehicles powered with batteries sourced in China, which currently produces over 80 percent of the rare earth minerals and is permitting two new coal plants every week.

The Supreme Court has rightly put an end to this decades-long march of illegal federal overreach by the Biden administration and the Obama administration before it. Justices were right to strip this undelegated power from federal agencies.

The biggest winners of the Supreme Court's decision will be the American people, who will see reduced costs and inflation, a stronger economy, a more reliable electrical grid, and environmental stewardship led by the states. After all, no one is more committed to protecting our clean air, water and land than the people who live here.
