Properly Curing Hay Is Crucial For Forage Quality

Weather conditions across the Dakotas have created challenges for haymaking. Properly curing hay to the correct moisture level for bailing is crucial to maintaining forage quality. At baling, the moisture level should be a maximum of 20 percent for small square bales, 18 percent for round bales and 15 percent for large square bales. The larger the forage package, the lower the moisture should be at baling.

Exceeding these moisture levels can reduce dry matter and nutrient content for the hay, says James Rogers, North Dakota State University Extension forage crops production specialist. At harvest, hay naturally contains microbial content. Curing limits aerobic microbial growth to occur. Baling hay at moisture levels above 25 percent creates an environment for aerobic microbial growth to occur. These microbes are living organisms that feed off of the nutrient content of the hay and generate heat. As heat increases, a chemical bond forms between proteins and carbohydrates (maillard reaction), reducing dry matter and digestibility of the end product. Although this reaction produces a more palatable hay, the loss of energy and digestible protein lowers its quality. Several methods exist to accelerate drying time to prevent moisture-damaged hay. First, if possible, condition the hay at cutting. Conditioning crimps the stems, which hastens moisture loss and speeds drying. Second, when cutting, spread the forage out into as wide a swath as possible. This increases the surface area exposed to sunlight. Third, hay can be inverted or flipped over, or if this is not possible, rake the hay a couple of extra times to get hay moved from the bottom of a window to the top. However, be cautious with delicate crops such as alfalfa, as mechanical handling can cause leaf loss.

Using a preservative can also accelerate the time from hay mowing to bailing. Preservatives will not lower the moisture content of hay, but they will lower anaerobic microbial growth, decreasing hay heating and thus dry matter and nutrient loss. Preventatives allowed baling at a hay moisture content of 25-30 percent. Beyond 30 percent moisture, they will not be effective. Baleage is an option for hays with greater than a 30 percent moisture content. Another important point is that the effect will not last indefinitely. After about 30 days, the effect of a preservative treatment will begin to dissipate. If using a preservative, plan on feeding preserved hay early in the season and avoid storing preserved hay with untreated cured hay.

Three types of preservatives are available: organic acids, ammoniabased and microbial. Anhydrous ammonia is an effective anti-microbial preservative but requires extreme caution in handling and application to avoid personal injury. In addition, it may produce toxicity in high quality hay, potentially causing livestock death. For these reasons, treating high moisture hay with ammonia is not recommended. Microbial products are available, but their effectiveness as a preservative is not supported by research. Organic acids are reliable, effective and time tested. Propionic acid is the most common of these, and though it is effective, it can be corrosive. Buffers can be mixed with propionic acid to reduce the corrosiveness. Read and follow label directions with propionic acid use as the rates will vary based on moisture content of the hay. Getting good distribution of propionic acid onto the hay is needed to get the most effective treatment. The solution is most often applied at the pickup prior to entering the bale chamber.

Other essential tools including a moisture tester and temperature probe. Various moisture meters are available on the market. It is advisable to check moisture meter accuracy with another method such as the microwave method. A bale temperature probe is useful for monitoring bale temperature when moisture content is suspected to be high until temperatures stabilize. Bale temperatures around 100 degrees Fahrenheit are normal, but if temperatures reach 150 degrees and remain elevated, it signals a problem. The longer a bale stays at an elevated temperature, the more damage will occur.

"Forage testing is always a good management strategy," says Rogers. This year when hay may be baled at questionable moisture, forage testing becomes even more important. Knowing available versus unavailable protein and digestibility can make a real difference come this winter.

Campaigns Ramp Up Messaging For ND Property Tax Question

the losses.

By Mike Moen, Prairie News Service

Signatures are expected to be submitted for a potential fall ballot question which would largely do away with property taxes in North Dakota.

The Secretary of State will review the signatures sent in by petition organizers, who said property owners are in big need of tax relief. A coalition opposing the idea is intensifying efforts to lay out the consequences.

Chad Oban, executive director of the teacher's union North Dakota United, echoed what other skeptics pointed out: The plan does not explain how the lost revenue would be replaced. In addition to key services funded by local property taxes, such as schools and emergency response, Oban warned of other harm.

"People who have money are buying up property all over the country and turning it into rental property or Airbnbs and that kind of thing,' Oban pointed out. "That's going to happen here. I mean, if you're an investor, why not buy property in a place where you're not going to pay property taxes?"

He added it could unfold as North Dakota grapples with an affordable housing shortage. An independent analysis by the Legislative Council estimated a statewide revenue loss plants."

By Mike Moen,

Prairie News Service Advancing clean energy sources can be a tricky topic in oil-producing states like North Dakota. But a nonpartisan analysis says the facts are clear about what causes electric bills to climb, and renewables aren't among them.

This month, a report from the independent think tank Energy Innovation says one third of U.S. households had to forego basic necessities to pay energy bills last year. As the nation scales up the transition to sources like wind and solar power, those opposed to clean energy rebates and other climate policies say the movement is harming consumers, with higher costs to keep the lights on.

But report author Brendan Pierpont (director of electricity modelng for Energy Innovation) said the facts show otherwise. "Nationally, we found big drivers of rising rates are climate change impacts, and extreme weather - and fossil fuel costs," said Pierpont, "like volatile natural gas prices, and utility investment in aging, expensive coal

Governor Doug Burgum has increasingly become a staunch supporter of oil and gas production, but North Dakota has been a top ten state for wind energy generation. The report says states with significant clean energy growth have not generally experienced rate hikes above inflation. Between 2010 and 2023, North Dakota was in the middle of the pack for rate increases, but still below the national average. Those who oversee the power grid warn that the rapid push toward renewables could create reliability issues in the short term, especially with rising electricity demand from places like big data centers.

Grid improvement projects are taking shape, also affecting energy bills. But Pierpont suggested not enough of them are designed to expand transmission lines."It's only a pretty small portion of the total transmission and distribution pie that is expanding the grid," said Pierpont, "either to meet rising demand or to integrate new resources, like wind and solar."Pierpont said those cleaner sources are becoming much cheaper, and if utilities and grid operators focus more on larger projects that get them online, they'll offset the factors pushing electricity bills higher.

In 2022, the Midcontinent Independent System Operator approved a $10 billion transmission plan to accommodate growth in renewables. North Dakota falls under the MISO map.
