

Make Sure Trees, Shrubs Are Winter Hardy Before Purchasing

Agriculture Commissioner Doug Goehring is encouraging homeowners to read the tag and research varieties before buying and planting nursery stock for their property.

"Spring is here, and homeowners may be anxious to add trees and shrubs to their landscapes," Goehring said. "Many varieties of trees and shrubs adapt well to North Dakota's climate and soils, but before you plant, you may want to talk with a trusted local nursery dealer, horticulturist or local extension agent. They will help you select nursery stock that you will enjoy for years to come."

Goehring said the North Dakota Department of Agriculture receives numerous complaints every year from both consumers and dealers about non-hardy stock being sold in the state. North Dakota is in plant hardiness zones 3 and 4. Using a trusted source to verify that the plant tag shows the correct hardiness zone for that plant species is recommended.

State law requires that all trees and shrubs, designated by the agriculture commissioner as non-hardy must be labeled "non-hardy in North Dakota."

"Selling unlabeled non-hardy stock is bad behavior, predatory in nature and a waste of the consumer's money," Goehring said. "Consumers who purchase unlabeled non-hardy stock should return it for a full refund."

The penalty for violating the law is up to $500 per incident. Repeated violations can result in denial or revocation of a nursery license.

"Some plants are not adapted to surviving our North Dakota winters when the temperature can drop to 25 degrees below zero and colder," Goehring said. "Some plants may not tolerate our soil types or dry winter conditions. Plants not adapted to our environment can also make them more susceptible to plant pests and diseases."

The most common, non-hardy trees and shrubs offered for sale in North Dakota include emerald arborvitae, dwarf Alberta spruce, eastern redbud, oakleaf hydrangea, Japanese snowball (Viburnum plicatum), dappled willow and certain varieties of fruit trees, such as peaches and sweet cherries. Emerald arborvitae and dwarf Alberta spruce are sometimes labeled as hardy from 30 to 40 degrees below zero, but they tend to winter burn badly resulting in death or severe dieback.

NDDA nursery inspectors have been out visiting nurseries and checking for non-hardy nursery stock as well as other compliance with North Dakota nursery law, including proper labeling, pests and
