share opportunities. The Grazing Lands Coalition, which helped organize the event, used its booth to highlight its mentor network and upcoming field days.

NDGLC Chair Jay Reiser, who also ranches near Washburn, said the exhibition booths are often where the most meaningful conversations happen.

"Producers want to talk to people who understand the land," Reiser said. "These groups bring different tools, but the goal is the same: healthier grasslands and stronger operations."

Attendees drifted between tables, comparing notes on grazing systems, drought planning and habitat projects. Some came seeking technical advice, others were simply curious about which programs might fit their land.

By lunchtime, the room had settled into a steady hum of conversation, a mix of questions, stories and the kind of practical problem-solving that happens when people who work the land gather in the same space.

While the afternoon panel drew the spotlight, the exhibition booths offered something just as valuable: a chance for ranchers and conservation groups to meet one another not as agencies and applicants, but as neighbors working toward the same healthy landscape.
