Coyotes struggle with consistency

The Grant County Coyotes faced a challenging week, struggling to find their rhythm in a match marked by inconsistency, a persistent issue the team has been working on since the start of the season.

Tuesday, the Coyotes hosted the New England Tigers. "We put together a mostly good match, but we were not consistent throughout," said Head Coach Ashley Laub. "This has been the thorn in our side, something we continue to work on each week."

One standout player was Amberly Sauter, who made significant contributions at the net. "Amberly did a great job on the net and was able to get quite a few touches and blocks, which helped our defense," noted Laub.

In their match against Washburn on Thursday, the Coyotes started strong, winning the first two sets with confidence and energy. The players were smiling, communicating well, and their teamwork was evident. However, as the game progressed, their demeanor shifted. The energy and momentum they built early in the match began to fade.

"The more experience some of our newer varsity players get in high-pressure environments, the more confidence they'll gain," Laub explained. "That confidence, both individually and as a team, will help them maintain the level of play we saw in the first two sets."

As the match continued, the Coyotes' lack of consistency and mental toughness became more apparent. "Volleyball is a game of momentum, and once we let that momentum go after the second set, it was difficult to get it back," said Laub. "I was proud of the girls for continuing to fight, and I hope they gained a lot of confidence from those first two sets."

Senior Amberly Sauter reflected on the match, acknowledging where the team struggled: "In the beginning, we came out with a lot of confidence, but in the third and fourth set, we lost our momentum and the energy we were using. We stopped swinging and stopped talking as much, and I feel like that caused problems."

As the Coyotes look ahead, the focus remains on building consistency and mental toughness, areas that will be key to their success as the season progresses.
