During an allergic reaction

The immune system overreacts to a harmless substance (allergen), producing IgE antibodies that trigger mast cells to release histamine and other chemicals. This causes a range of symptoms from localized effects like itchy skin and a stuffy nose to full-body reactions called anaphylaxis, characterized by swelling, difficulty breathing, and a dangerous drop in blood pressure.

1. The Immune System's Mistake
Allergen detection: Your immune system mistakenly identifies a harmless substance, such as pollen, a food, or medication, as a threat. IgE antibody production: It produces Immunoglobulin E (IgE) antibodies specifically designed to recognize this allergen.
2. The Chemical Cascade
Sensitized mast cells: IgE antibodies attach to immune cells called mast cells, making them "sensitized". Histamine release: The next time you encounter the allergen, the IgE antibodies signal the mast cells to release chemicals like histamine.
3. The Resulting Symptoms
Histamine and other inflammatory chemicals cause various effects throughout the body, depending on the allergen and how it entered the body. Skin: Itching, redness, hives, or swelling of the lips and face. Respiratory system: Stuffy nose, sneezing, coughing, wheezing, and difficulty breathing. Circulatory system: A sudden drop in blood pressure (hypotension), a weak pulse, dizziness, and even loss of consciousness. Digestive system: Nausea, vomiting, abdominal pain, or diarrhea.
4. Severe Allergic Reaction
(Anaphylaxis) Anaphylaxis is a severe, life-threatening reaction where the body's immune response becomes widespread. Symptoms can develop rapidly and include throat closing, chest tightness, confusion, a feeling of impending doom, and a blueish tint to the skin from a lack of oxygen. Anaphylaxis requires immediate medical attention, according to the Asthma and Allergy Foundation of America | AAFA.
