military objectives, acknowledge challenges and identify achievements. Based on these hearings, Congress might decide to terminate the hostilities or perhaps increase funding, or possibly instruct the president to change course, as it has throughout American history, all in the exercise of its constitutional authority over the commander in chief in the conduct of the war.

Trump's unilateral War in Iran, however, bears none of these constitutional characteristics. Once again, the Republican controlled Congress, which has unconstitutionally ceded some of the legislature's fundamental powers—appropriations and lawmaking, among others—has elected to facilitate Trump's authoritarian presidency, rather than honoring its constitutional responsibilities.

There is, across the vista of two centuries, the echo of Patrick Henry's plaintive plea in the Virginia Ratifying Convention: "If you depend on your President's and Senator's patriotism, you are gone."
